Hello Dear Friends,

We visited India this summer. It was quite eventful. As Dan had explained earlier, the water well had dried up this last spring. We attempted to dig a new well at the front of the property while I was there. The following are a couple pictures of the heavy equipment that came to dig it. It was going to go approximately 1000 feet deep.

They came at night with the intention of drilling through the night. However, they got stuck in the soft sand coming in, and waited until morning to resume. They did finally get it in place, and started drilling late morning.

However, after they had reached about 100 feet, the village elders came and gave a cease and desist order. They were concerned that it would take away from the water for their own village well. We had no choice but to stop. We are now planning to attempt to revive the old well.

Here you see the children watching over the drilling just before school from the roof top of the building across from the drill site.

On another note, some dear friends came to visit and help out. Their names were Bill and Monet Sexton.

They were originally from North Carolina, where they had their dream farm, and a very successful business established as Chiropractors. They felt God had called them to ministry, so they sold it all, and moved to China to do their ministry. However, they did give us over 2 weeks of their time to help with the children, including medical checkups, teaching for the Bible College, and more. They were a delight to have.

Being there in the summer means monsoon time. That we did experience. When we first arrived early June, there had not been too much rain yet, and it was hot, probably high 90's. But later we did get rain, and by the time we left in August, temperatures were quite pleasant. At one time, the campus looked like a lake.

And the following are just a variety of snapshots I took while visiting.

Group shot of all the children.

Center left is our cook, along with children that do kitchen help, and learning to cook and prepare meals.

Little hands reaching over the wall, begging for candy.

Meal time in the dining area.
